RE: Ideal Corporate Funding Recommendation

As a matter of reference,

During the past decade, I've had the good fortune of engaging and learning more about Ideal Corporate Funding, Irving Ayash and his team members.

When corporations outgrow the collateral base or the traditional bank lending capacities for a single lender, the need for next-level finance triggers. Growth and emerging companies often find their growth limited by their access to capital based on collateral or lending caps to a single business within a lending institution. This is when corporate finance emerges. In our business ventures, we have been approached by a variety of finance companies – none like Ideal Corporate Funding (ICF).

What sets ICF apart is hard to express in a reference letter – it's more of an experience. The depth of working knowledge and comprehension of business, regardless of industry, is readily apparent. Where most companies are limited in their growth by financial caps, ICF is focused on how to reduce or eliminate the barriers to growth.

Understanding what's possible with corporate finance allows companies to reshape business development, not only with current expansion, but building out new channels and opportunities. ICF invests their time and knowledge to explore how to maximize opportunities. When compared to most finance houses whose focus is limited to balance sheets, income statements and collateral basis, ICF engages the business, considers its own value-added networks and provides insights on how to further accelerate the business, while integrating financial methods to accomplish the increased opportunities. By taking an active role in growing its clients, ICF grows with the affiliation and assistance.

Should your corporation/company be experiencing accelerated growth, a need for additional properties, facilities, inventories, equipment or exploring corporate finance options at any level or scale, I would recommend contacting ICF first. It may save considerable time and effort.
